This mineral "chain of being," with continuous degradation from the most complex to the simplest, is similar to Lamarck's later theory of the evolution of species: Each stressed the gradual and successive production of forms, while denying the relevance of defined species. He noted that slight changes in climate or topography might eliminate a species from a region and cause readjustment in the remaining populations.

Calceolaria uniflora syn. Perhaps it is time for a less whiggish revisiting of the legacy of Davis than that presented by Chorley, Lamarck et son Oeuvre (French Edition) and Dunn and even a recognition that the ideas of Davis may still have something to offer current practitioners of geomorphology. The second involved the acceleration of the early stages of development, or condensation, to permit completion of the developmental sequence in a fixed time period, but with the addition of new evolutionary stages. The main geological force was water acting according to uniformitarian principles over millions of years.
